Policy Spotlight: Province Reviewing Fiscal Situation

Over the past two weeks the government has released the results of two reviews of Ontario's finances under the previous Liberal government. While the reviews both noted concern about deficit-spending and Ontario's high level of debt, neither provided any evidence of fraud or abuse.

The report of the Independent Financial Commission of Inquiry, released on September 21, recommended that the government adhere to the Canadian Public Sector Accounting Standards on the treatment of certain pension assets and the debt associated with the suppression of electricity rates by the Liberal government's "Fair Hydro Plan." These changes will increase the province's deficit to $15 billion this year.

A week later the government released the results of a line-by-line audit conducted by EY Canada. Amongst the report's conclusions were recommendations that the province provide fewer services, charge more for them, sell off Crown assets, means-test more provincial programs, and consolidate some of Ontario's arms-length agencies.

While it's not entirely clear how these two reviews of government spending will impact the government's priorities, it is reasonable to assume that they will have an impact on a range of government spending and programs, including those that benefit the municipal sector. Notably the audit highlighted transfer payments as an area of government spending that has grown exponentially.

Even before these two reviews, the incoming government promised to cut spending by 4% without eliminating any public sector jobs. The PC platform did not provide any details on where these cuts would come from, identify any large programs that they intended to cut, or indicate their intention to generate new revenue by increasing taxes. In order to cut 4% of government spending, and eliminate a now-$15 billion deficit, the government will need to introduce significant cuts across government. Municipalities should begin to plan for the implications of potential cuts, should they occur to programs that benefit local government.
